In Minyaa village, there lived a tall man. His name was Hongoa. He was married with six children. Hongoa was very rich. He owned many goats, cows, sheep, horses and camels. He engaged many people to care for his animals. Every evening he would sit under the shed and watch his animals coming from grazing. As he watched the animals, he would say to himself, "This is how a man should live". He got a lot of milk from his cows. He sent a few of his employees to the nearby village to sell some of it. He used some of the money he earned to buy some sugar, salt and bars of soap. Hongoa was a kind and humble man, so he treated his workers equally. Hongoa built a school in his village. All the children in his neighbourhood studied there and most of them have been performing well in their final examinations.
